The Green Frogs is a Korean folktale about two frogs that never listened to their mother, whatever she said they would do the opposite. If she said be quiet, they would croak loudly, if she said don’t get dirty they would play in the mud. This went on for years and years and finally the mother frog got sick and knew she was going to die.

Regretful of their past behavior, the sons obey her wish, which is why each time the stream threatens to flood her grave, they sit by the waters and weep. It's also why naughty children in Korea are called ``green frogs.'' Heo (Father's Rubber Shoes?, 1995) provides a gleefully fatalistic retelling, but the writing is surprisingly wooden.

According to this tale, when young children in Korea misbehave, their mothers call them chung-gaeguri or green frogs. This is a picture book which would be appropriate for any age depending on instructional use. I read this story aloud to two Korean students who were new to our school. They knew of the tale and appreciated the familiarity.

Poor Franky sat in the pouring rain by the riverbank, and cried and cried. And that’s why, to this day, frogs croak when it rains. The moral of the story is to teach children to obey and respect their parents before it’s too late. In Korea, parents playfully tease disobedient children by calling them “green frogs.”.
