Acts of Worship, the title story, is a Dostoievskian tale of two characters at the opposite end of the age range from Cigarette and Martyrdom, mired in repressions buried deep beneath the neurotic-eccentric self images they have constructed to present to and survive in the world - an egotistical professor and his 'uneducated' self-abnegating housekeeper - with a common bond as cultivators of poetry - in a narcissist/co-dependant dance.

Acts of Worship is an excellent short story collection by Yukio Mishima, who committed ritual suicide in 1970 (obviously, one can't help but draw parallels between certain characters and Mishima himself). 'Sword,' 'Cigarette,' and 'Act of Worship' stand out among the seven, there were really no time-wasters here.

Seven stories spanning most of the career of the foremost Japanese novelist of his time (1925-70), best known in America for The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea and his Sea of Fertility tetralogy. Mishima's favorite themes--the ambiguity of love, the discovery of identity through ritual, self-surrender and self-control--make him an acquired taste in the West, and this new volume of chips from an austere ...

Acts of Worship Quotes by Yukio Mishima - Goodreads

These seven stories are all radically different; characters, time period, length--but they all hold something very poignant about them. Like the Professor recommending to his maid in "Act of Worship" the beautifully written prose of vast scenery and metaphoric imagery -- I too recommend this collection for those reasons.

In Acts of Worship, Mishima captures the nihilistic despair and complex beauty of characters and settings much like in his longer work. While still containing the essence of his style, the short length of the stories do not allow room for a complete showcase of his talent. Some of the stories are only satisfactory, but others are excellent quality.
