Written from the perspective of an unbeliever, Fear and Trembling explores the paradox of faith, the nature of Christianity and the complexity of human emotion. Kierkegaard examines the biblical story of Abraham, instructed to sacrifice his son Isaac, and forces us to consider Abraham's state of mind.

Fear and Trembling Writing under the pseudonym of "Johannes de Silentio," Kierkegaard discusses the story from the Bible, Genesis 22:1-18, of Abraham's willingness to sacrifice Isaac. For this deed, Abraham is normally acknowledged as the father of faith, but in this day and age, Johannes remarks, no one is content with faith.

Kierkegaard regularly wrote under pseudonyms, and Fear and Trembling is no exception. As in the passage quoted above, the narrator Johannes de Silentio speaks directly to us. Kierkegaard published Fear and Trembling in 1843. He hoped to problematize what he felt were overly simplistic and uncritical interpretations of Christianity.

The personal aspect of Kierkegaard's writings is sometimes seen as a shortcoming. The fact that a work can exist on more than level is simply part of the author's genius. As Either/Or is concerned with the esthetic and the ethical, Fear and Trembling is concerned with the ethical and the religious.

In the rest of Fear and Trembling, Kierkegaard examines his four retellings of the story of Abraham, focusing on the religious and the ethical. Kierkegaard claims that the killing of Isaac is ethically wrong but religiously right. Kierkegaard also uses his retelling of the Abraham story to distinguish between faith and resignation.

But, given the tremendous dangers of error (either being deceived or self-deceiving) this act can only be done in fear and trembling, in awesome dread and terror of error, only in an infinite leap of faith in God. Abraham makes the leap and is thus, for Kierkegaard a great hero and the first historical figure of faith.
