Minjung theology is based on the "image of God" concept expressed in Genesis 1:26-27, but also incorporates the traditional Korean feeling of han, a word that has no exact English translation, but that denotes a sense of inconsolable pain and utter helplessness. Minjung theology depicts commoners in Korean history as the rightful masters of their own destiny.

Most inspired by the effort to contextualize theology, the book postulates shared experiences by Third World women of struggles caused by collective realities of the history of centuries of rooted colonialism and missionary paternalism. This common experience of struggle functions not only as the sharpest difference of Third World women from western women, but also as the ground for their unity which is employed as their most crucial methodology.

Multiple Perspectives on the Korean War. But as with all historical interpretation, there are other perspectives to consider. The Soviet Union, for its part, denied Truman's accusation that it was directly responsible. The Soviets believed that the war was "an internal matter that the Koreans would [settle] among themselves."
