Richard Kramer's THESE THINGS HAPPEN is a very well-observed novel about a fifteen-year-old boy's coming-of-age in present-day Manhattan. He (Wesley) is straight, while his best friend is gay. He is living, only very recently, with his father and his father's boyfriend.

These Things Happen is told in the present tense, mostly from multiple first person perspectives. Kramer's experience as a screenwriter (ThirtySomething, My So-Called Life) serves him well in differentiating the nuances of one character's voice from another. No one but Ben, Wesley's stepfather through his mother's marriage, could begin his chapter with these words arranged in this grammatical structure: "Professionally, at least, I'm a symbolic man and only because of my field ...

Trouble does call around in Richard Kramer's new novel of contemporary family life. These Things Happen and the cherishing lacking in the blend of second time around couplings, and the effect on the first time around child, ensures that it will change the course of what had been, at least on the surface anyway, a loving family group.

These Things Happen is a big little book. A big little funny book. Two days, a handful of characters, a school, a restaurant, a cramped Manhattan apartment and a roof. We take a peek and Kramer opens up the world. The skinny: Wesley, a sixteen-year old, is living with his gay dad and his long-term partner, George, as a way to get closer to his dad.

These Things Happen is greater than the tacitility of its descriptions and the tragicomic vivacity of its characters. This is a novel of the sort that defines generations. Weaving together the individual struggles of his various characters with profound empathy, Kramer asks the reader to consider the limitations of genial political correctness, and even the very notion of love . . . .

Richard Kramer quotes Showing 1-16 of 16. "This is us, then, at night. Two men, slowly crumbling, minding our business in the bed we flip four times a year to extend its life. I've got my side, Kenny's got his, and from time to time we meet in the middle to do what Men Like That (like us) do in a bed; it's not always hot, not after all this time, but it's reassuring.
